DELPHINE-CHARLOTTE PARMENTIER
JEWELRY

Like a character out of a fashion fairytale, Delphine-Charlotte Parmentier (even the name is picturesque) learned to love jewelry assisting her grandparents at their button and fashion-accessory workshop (the French equivalent of a mom and pop shop). She went on to pursue a higher aesthetic education steeped in ancient--and increasingly rare--techniques such as cloisonné (an enameling process) and cire perdue (that's bronze casting to the rest of us) before taking over and transforming her grandparents' workshop into a personal fantasy factory. Launching in the starkly minimalist early-090s, Parmentier was anything but: with her intricate, couture-quality craftsmanship and wildly creative designs she soon attracted the attention of like-minded, envelope-pushing designers who began commissioning collaborations for the runway. This closely guarded A-list clientele exists to this day: even a cursory survey of Parmentier's current catalogue with its extravagant, navel-grazing, charm-bedecked chain necklaces, among other designs, brings certain iconic fashion houses immediately to mind. It's no surprise, then, that no style-setter's trip to Paris is complete without a pilgrimage to her cozy boutique located just beneath that very same workshop in the city's boho-chic Le Marais district. Not hopping the pond anytime soon? Just click here for photos.
